heat made us, and not we ourselves." This seems to be the moral of Pendennis, wherein it differs materially from the moral of Tom Joues; but Tom Jones was a foundling of the eighteenth century, whereas Pendennis was a gentleman of this. A Bloody Business.

We give this morning additional particulars concerning the assassination of Rives Pollard. There is hardly any room to doubt that it was a thoroughly brutal and cowardly mander. The article in the Opinion was bad coough, heaven knows; but nothing is so bad that it should justify a man's going into a room, locking the door and firing upon his unconscious adversary from a window. Rives Pollard is in his grave without knowing who sent him there, and, desperado that he was, we cannot help an expression of our detestation of the mode by which he came to his death. It appears that Pollard did not write the offensive article; that he was ignorant of its appearance eighteenth century, whereas Pendeunis was a gentleman of this.

It was not wise in Thackeray to suggest a comparison. It would not be fair in us to make one. Fielding's object was to create a man; and be certainly succeeded only too well. Thackeray had the same thought in his mind; but his stage was narrow and the stomach of his audience squeamish, so that he has given us a man before the foot-lights, only following him to the wings and peeping after him as he goes off behind the scenes. As far as we see him, Pendenuls is proper and natural; and no writer—certainly no writer who has written in London or New York—can fail to love the book as in some sort a pleture of his own experiences and adventures; for, as we have said, the life of the young journalist in all of the great cities is much the same. The same wild, vehement infatuation for letters; the same wallting ambition; the same motiled purpose, scattering over every article; that he was ignorant of its appearance in his paper, and that Grant gave him so warning nor demanded any redress. He shot him down from a safe concealment, like a coward; and that he should have been bailed by a Richmond Jury for any conceivable need of moor and working each by turns, and all indifferently; poetry, bistory, romance, criticism, art, politics and paragraphs. Who, we repeat, does not remember a Care of Harmony or a Back Kitchen?
Who has not fallen victims to the fascinations reality of newspaper writing. Newspaper writers pick up a deal of knowledge of books and Lowledge of the world during their up-and-down, regard-and-tamble way of the, and if too much of it be composed of mere decontains it yet answers a purpose and, directed by a dins-taking, hard-working ability, schieves cometimes immense success. Nor is this uncomposed of the composition rved; as who shall say that Dickens ha descreed; as who shall say that Dickens has not tione as much good as John Stuart Mill, and Thackersy as much good as Thomas Carles? Yet Dickens has never been a student as Mill has been, and Thackersy roamed about as his fancy led him and enjoyed himself heartlly. The weary scholar and the work-a-day drudge for often heard to complain of their lot in life. Not unfrequently they make comparisons between their labor and that which supplies occupation merely to their more fortunate breth-

The likelihood is that Pen and the It is usually best to let these matters take their ceurse. The likelihood is that Pen and the Fotheringay would have quit of themselves had they been left alone. Nevertholess the Major discharges his mission handsomely, and it must be owned by fair-minded readers that he is, all in all, a most admirable person of his class; not a popular, though a numerous class, be it known; a class, however, which society could not well get on without; its boot-jacks and hat-pegs, which it uses and abuses.

Major Pendennis is not contemptible in the neuccas and the Jempar. We near of Dick-ens coming from his four or five week's seclu-sion with the Chimes in his hand, "wan, hervous, and quite broken down." There are many examples which show that one line of literary work is hardly worse or better than itterary work is hardly worse or better than snother, except as the pen is guided by the inspiration of real aptitude and love. Mauling rails is not so bad if a man prefer to man! rails, as many men do; and there are fictions which indicate that they cost no less nusecular effort. Novel writing is a distinct profession. Nor is it the least difficult department of letters; and all the great novellists must be credited with a fair share of the tofls of the eraff. Thackersy enjoyed much, we dare say, but he suffered much also, and he did an immense amount of work in the surfererstre. Even Pendennis was well in the aggregate. Even Pendennis was well nigh ended in death, and is dedicated to the nigh ended in death, and is dedicated to the good doctor, to whom we are asked to be indebted for its completion. It came two years after Vanity Fair and was as well received.

Whatever critical differences may crist between the two books is matter for analysis.
The public does not stop to look into the abstruct. It takes its pleasure, as Dr. Primrose did not take his wife for a fine, glossy appearance trusting the final isane to luck, and quite content if it be pleased for the moment.
It takes a book upon its salicut points. Pendennis is full of these, and its hit was palpable career with a monitor so wise and selfash.

The second chapter in Mr. Peu's love-life is progressive. Mise Amory is certainly an improvement on Mise Costigan. The one spoke only the lines of others which old Bowstaught her to speak'; the other made her own lines, and was indeed, like the younger Mise Pecksniff, "a gushing thing," with white shoulders and pale cheeks and languid eyes, a very killing style of person to impetnous youth; in short, a poctess! Pen displayed throughout this fiiration a weak and generous spirit. The truth is that there was much in common between the two; but the thing was clearly impossible. One part of the mission of woman marsh with a good balance.

Exacting judges have pronounced the character of Arthur insignificant, if not a little contemptible. Such critics are surely numindful of the peculiar temperament, and an ancommon one either, which Thackery sought to depict in the person of that young gentleman. That the boy should have been infatuated with the Fotheringay; that he should have fallen in love with Blanche Amory; that he should have had that episode with little Fanny Bolton, which caused the hearts of Mrs. Pendennis and Lauris Bell such pauge of grief, and mortification, and jealous chagrin; and that he should have finally married Laura, are circumstances to natural that they could hardly have happened otherwise. The world is full of such lads, and it is well that it is so. In spite of their shortcomings, their fickleness, their weakness, for which they are generally made to pay, they get on well, and do good as Penden. moral of the piece. She is a naughty girl, and the moralist says to this feminine readers through her. "Is she not a delightful bit of stucco, to be admired, to be avoided, show all, not to be imitated?" So, be daubs her over toward the close, and presented to the state of the scakness, for which they are generally man-ay, they get on well, and do good as Pend nis did. That they are often plunged into quagmires of sentimental distress is reasonable and not discreditable. It is not that they should be able to keep always on terra firma; but that, being tempted and involved, and yielding to the movements that arise out of human nature and the situation, they should to conduct themselves as men of honor, as good men, and not as saints or marble statics. This Pendennis did. We do not suspect him of anything that could or ought to blacken his fame. He was indeed fickle and sentimental; but how many spirited young fellows does, and to appreciate her affectionate nature and pure womanhood, in spite of her quiet and simple ways, and to love her heartily. and simple ways, and to love her heartily.

The love offlar with Blanche Amory closes Pen's rustic existence by the river Brawl; and next we have our Prince of Fair Oaks, having iailed at Oxford, transported to chambers in London, where he begins his literary life, with Warrington for a companion; and what a life
it is to be sure!

it is to be sure!

Where is the man of letters who does not look back with a sort of sneaking, half-bashful regret over those young days and nights of noble toil and splendid ambition; when to write the best histories; the best tragedies; the best poems; the best romances; the best casays, was his business and condient belief, no doubt about his genius; no doubt about his success; no distrust of the world; rose-color to look upon; rose-water to drink; and a little sentiment now-and-then to season it with, and oceans of innocent genh and demonstration!

The stage is a sort of Aladdin's garden; and all the fruit and flowers are real. Old Bows in the orchestra is a magician. Little Pimis the ambitious boy that is not conceited and foppish? The hero period of faction exists no longer. Wherefore? Because heroics are not of our day. I dure say there was a time when Lovelace went down at Belinda's feet in soher rnest. I dare say there was a time when e Knight of Crossbows had but one lady, r whom he achieved scars and glory. Feuself. Of these, concentrated sentiment is xeeptional. Pen sets out with one flame; not before our author is done with him he has and four affairs of the heart. Edgar A Post (a loyal spirit to the old legendary trinciple) denounced Charles Lever savagely ceause he permitted O'Malley to love two comen at the same time. Authony Trollops. dies!

Pen's life was like the rest, and he came out of it with his wings unsinged and his heart pure; and, after all, this it is which we must look to and take note of, for there be many that fall by the way, and accomplish but one great melancholy drawn in which they act the leading and saddest part. Thæckeray, who know his ground throughly having cone. quite an authority in such matters, puts the point more defuly. I find in the last number of St. Paul's and the 50th chapter of Phineas Pilnn a most incid and satisfactory illustra-tion. The truth is that Pendennis was heartiet his true divinity; and did his sentim lizing in a plain and moderate and prud hion. No great affection in thi errows, heart-burnings, troubles of everkind. That love is to some extent an idealism may be true enough, but if it be permanent it must be built upon something more tangible than an idea. The earlier fictions usually left the heroine and hero at the siter. The novel of life does not stop at a point so inslipid. The reason is that the genuine sincerity and pathos of life is brought out by a different set of relations than are found in the routine of ever-day courtship. The acters were our personal acquaintances, each event falling out as unanspectedly as the incidents which we actually encounter day by day; a peculiar gift of our author, who throws a prodigious quantity of animal magnetism into all his writing. It is as if he were telling us by word of mouth in his genial, off-hand way the story of So and-so, whom we have mutually known, and in whose fortunes we take a lively and kindly interest. No writer of fiction has equaled him in this. idealism of unfledged lovers is insufficient to support the demands of ambitious fiction. It goes farther. It takes life in all its phases, and, as we see in the Newcomes, its greatest power lies in those passages which are pro-duced by complications that cannot be found in the ordinary, hundrum, sentimental intercourse between young men and young wothe stace a lively and kindly interest. No writer of fiction has equaled him in this.

In writing the novel of Prodomis, Thackeray confesses that he had the novel of Tons Joses in his mind's eye; and if the later book rall short of its great prototype in power, amplitude and purpose, as it does undoubtedly, much of the deficiency may be set down to the conventionalism of modern life. The distance is not nearly so great between the two writers; for the author of The Newcomes, hardly less and detective gentus, the keenest natural love for truth, the brayest sense of honest dealing in all things, thorough detestation of hypocrisy, and the happlest satirtied; and of laughing it to, scorn, joined to tenderness, charity and grace, which everywhere bubble up like running springs from the bottom of some threads of love and desire are entangled with the piece, must the whole web be rent in a main grace, which everywhere bubble up has so wove her web of kindness that some threads of love and desire are entangled with the piece, must the whole web be rent in a main grace, which everywhere bubble up has so wove her web of kindness that some threads of love and desire are entangled with the piece, must the whole web be rent in a rawing them out? Whip me such stoles, great Governor of Nature, said I to myself.

Wherever Previdence shall place me for the trials of my viture; whatever is my danger, whatever my situation, let me feel the movements which ashee out of it and belong to me as a man, and if I govern them as a good one, I will time the lesse to the justifier, for thou The plot and action of Pendennis are more an interinde, as vanity fair is the genteel comedy of the Thackersyan dramatic repertory. The epic; the tragedy; the perfect romance, came later. Tom Jones must stand aside; Nicholas Nickieby must stand aside before that masterpiece. No critic can lay the Newcomes down without a sense of wonder not unlike that which he experienced as a school-box over those dreadful dramas of the Greeks. boy over those dreadful dramas of the Greeks. It is the perfect arch of the bridge over which The kersy has passed to posterity, and so long as English fletion is read it will hold its place; for there's not a speck of rottenness in it, nor a flaw of art; at once the wises, the tenderest, the truest embodiment of life to be tenderest, the truess embourament of the to be found in any age or language. It is a sermon which the pulpit has never equaled; and, though elaborated to the last degree, it has but one counterpart in point of intensity, and that is the Christmas Carol of Charles Dickens.

The Democratic organs denounce Radical members of Congress for drunkenness, and the Radical organs denounce Democratic members for drunkenness. We rather think that the denunciations on both sides are about equally just. We have had a pretty drunken Congress for several years, and we don't know that there has been are cardinated distributed as to collider distributed as Who has not fallen victims to the fascinations of some stage carchantress, short frocks, spangles and saw-dust? Who has not been fleeced by a Cortigan to find refuge at last in a Warrington? The moral of all this is plain. There is a certain needful routine through which almost every man of letters and every lournalist must pass before he sets himself to lecture upon life, which, in one way or another, is the business of us all who write what Mrs. Crowe calls "The Nightside of Nature."

After an interesting tour among the bears and bulls of Wall street, during the recent Eric War, in which "Uncie Daniel" was brought down on his knees to the tune of a million and a half, to the great delight of "the rest of mankind," I turned my face up town in search of those piquant spiritual mysteries of which we have heard much bul seen much less in Kentucky.

Thirty-fourth street and Broadway I found the half where spiritualists do congregate three times on Sunday and occasionally on other days. A highly respeciable and intelligent looking audience was assembled, and I took my seat behind a good looking clerymma and by the side of a lady as much distinguished by her personal worth and attractive grace and elegance of manners as by her literary merits, all of which are known to the editorial corps of the Courgins.
